ABSTRACT

This thesis analyzes character representation and symbolism in Gertrude Story's Alvena Schroeder trilogy, It Never Pays to Laugh Too Much, The Way to Always Dance and The Need of Wanting Always to demonstrate the potential of literature as a feminist tool. Reading strategies suggested by a liberal feminist critical approach demonstrate how these texts contribute to a growing body of literature which, through the power of language, offer models of resistance to women's oppression. The Bildungsroman conventions and variations applied throughout the analysis further demonstrate how conventional social norms inhibit women's social and psychological growth through restrictive social roles, and the possibility of women creating roles of their own defining.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to thank my supervisor, Paul Denham, for his unfailing kindness and good humour. I would also like to thank Gertrude Story and authors like her who contribute so much both to the world of art and to the world of living. Special thanks to the following: my brother Bill Collingridge and my friends Alice Wong, Korena Nessmann and Mayer Schulman for their unrelenting support and confidence in me; my sons Jon Collingridge and Anthony Flory for their patience during my long years as a student. Finally, thanks to the members of my committee for taking the time to read my thesis and provide their valuable input.

DEDICATION

To my mother ANNIE MAY COLLINGRIDGE, a strong and gentle soul who taught me that much could be done with little, and whose laughter and sense of fairness made the world a better place.
